A madman is the one who throws a stone into a well.

A stock, unrelated to its intrinsic value, becomes excessively inflated.

The stone is the thing thrown into the well.

A bubble forms in the broader market or in the stock's price.

Forty competent individuals—economists, analysts, fund managers, and academics—are the most skilled minds.

Fundamental analysis, technical analysis, the beta coefficient, and macroeconomic data are insufficient to explain it, because the madman does not act "rationally"; he acts "illogically, irrationally."

Even if the one who throws the stone into the well is a madman, the movement he starts grows with herd psychology, becomes enormous, and the forty wise men are left helpless. See: The GameStop event (2021).
